

Well after I finished primary school I was asked to do distance education and I wasn't sure about it because I wouldn't be in an actual classroom. So at first I didn't like the idea.

I couldn't go to a school where I lived because there weren't any high schools near here and mom wasn't really sure about enrolling me in actual classroom in high school. High school is very different from primary school because you're going to different subjects every 45 minutes. That's what led to the decision to go to distance education because I wouldn't actually be going to the school so there wouldn't be actual people in the classroom. Also while doing it, I could focus more on the lessons because of that. It was also easier because I could do the work. I wasn't rushed, not like 45 minutes and then you're done. It was any time you wanted to and what work you could in that time.

The benefits were 1) You don't have to go to the actual school, you're at home. 2) You can take breaks whenever you want. 3) You can choose what lesson you want to do. Another one is you're doing most of your work on the computer, which is easier for me and maybe some other kids as well. Another one is that you're not being rushed. You can take your time on what you're doing. In actual high school you have to do one period and another one straight after. But with distance education you can take your time. 4) Once you've done your work and you get it done very quickly you can have the rest of the day off and do whatever you want.
